

Dispersion as a Survival Strategy

Fábio Prates Machado, IME/USP

Abstract

We consider stochastic growth models to represent population subject to catastrophes. We analyze the subject from different set ups considering or not spatial restrictions, whether dispersion is a good strategy to increase the population viability. We find out it strongly depends on the type of populational behaviour when it faces a disaster, the spatial constraints of the environment and the probability that each exposed individual survives when a disaster stricks.